Black Civilizations Of Southeast Asia: Austro-Asiatic, Book 1

Synopsis

This book demonstrates that the builders of Southeast Asia's first civilizations were black people of Australo-Melanesian and Negrito type. This book does for Southeast Asian civilization what Professor Cheikh Anta Diop did for Egyptian civilization: it demonstrates it was built by black people. The genius of Diop's demonstration is that he quoted the leading experts of the field to clearly make his case, even though the experts in question would have opposed his black origins position. The author of this book manages the same by quoting the leading experts of Southeast Asian archaeology in books and peer reviewed articles to clearly make his case. Most Internet articles that are quoted are from university and museum websites and sourced from the top professors and PhDs in the field of Southeast Asian archaeology. In chapter six, the author also explores the subject of the origins of the Austro-Asiatic languages by referencing genetics, archaeology, and linguistics by citing Encyclopedia Britannica, the journal Evolutionary Biology, and the work of Dr. Roger Blench. This is a very sensitive subject and it would be naive to think that there will not be some nasty responses to this scholarly work. Whenever a book is written about the black origins of a civilization, some people will react as if the book is advocating for the inferiority of other races. The standard of such critique can be gauged from the complaint that the book highlights where civilization-builders are called "black and curly haired" but does not highlight the word "ugly". This is because the point of the book is to show the people were black and not show that someone thought they were ugly. Worse still, the same distorter claims "Throughout [the book] expert scholarship is ignored". This statement, from the person from the so-called Association for the History of Language, is a lie because the leading experts in the field are cited.

Love it.

great reseach. more volumes needed.

Good Book

This work, "Black Civilizations of Southeast Asia (Austro-Asiatic)", is truly ghastly, and deserves only to be pulped and recycled into toilet paper. The theoretical basis of the study is the false idea that there is unitary African black race which colonised and civilised Southeast Asia, and that this race is recognisable in the statues, paintings, architecture etc. of the region. Throughout expert scholarship is ignored, instead the writer prefers to offer selective and inappropriate quotes from websites to support his case, resorting to citations from scholarly works only infrequently. The standard of argumentation is illustrated as follows: on page 79 we are given a quote from Coedes, translating a Chinese account of Funnan, in which the locals are described as "all ugly, black, and frizzy haired". As if this is to persuade us that it refers to Africans. In the quote the author highlights the words "black, and frizzy haired" as if to make his point, while leaving "ugly" un-bolded. Here we see that even within cited material we are encouraged to take that which we favour and ignore that which we don't like. Most astonishingly to me, the author ignores more than a century of comparative linguistics, and in his chapter 6 cites just one source, a self published un-refereed paper (by Roger Blench, none-the-less a dear colleague of mine), for a linguistic perspective. Throughout we are treated to the crudest racist stereotyping, with the bulk of illustrations being faces of nameless representatives of various ethnic groups, paraded before us very much in the style of the war-time German magazine "Volk und Rasse". should be ashamed of selling such nonsense, and the publishers, identified as "Juniper Black History: New York" are clearly incompetent.

I found the infoemation contained timely and very credible since I was drawn to it by a very horrible and vindictive review and wanted to see if it was as horrible as stated.. Alas, all I found to be of horrible content was the review.
