The Amelioration And Abolition Of Slavery In Trinidad, 1812 - 1834: Experiments And Protests In A New Slave Colony

Synopsis

As the Preface states, this book is a result of a research project for the History Department of the University of the West Indies. It is a work which sought to examine the way in which the slave policy of the British government was implemented in a new slave colony. Faced with recalcitrance on the part of the older West Indian colonies, the Colonial Office did not accord Trinidad an independent legislature because it felt it could more easily implement its slave policy. Trinidad proved to be no more compliant than the other colonies, and logistically was not easy to supervise. No study has previously been done of the slave process in Trinidad. A statistical analysis of the registration was undertaken by A. Meredith John in 1988. The present study is important because it has focussed on an area that needed to be examined, and one which illustrates that one cannot generalise on the West Indies. It shows how easily a policy can fail, if administrators are not in sync - as those in London were not during this seminal period. The baneful effects of the British experiments extended to persons like the free coloured and black people, who were on the periphery of the system, but who were materially affected by it. This book is significant because it fills a gap in knowledge about an important aspect of the island's history. It also affords an opportunity to look at the attempt to make changes in a society that, for the most part, was not English. As such it stands as a warning of the need to understand the cultures of those for whom systems are devised before they are imposed.

Noel Titus is an Anglican priest, who has served parishes in the Dioceses of Trinidad and Tobago as well as Barbados. In both dioceses he has served on the Diocesan Council and on various Committees of Synod. He has also served on Commissions of the Provincial Synod between 1979 and 2004. Most of his ministry has been in the field of education, in which he has served as Lecturer and for 22 years as of Principal of Codrington College. He has worked tirelessly to collect records of the churches from repositories in England and the U.S.A. He has served as Chairman of the Caribbean Association of theological Schools for many years, on the Executive of the World Conference of Associations of Theological Institutions (WOCATI), and also as President of the Association of Caribbean tertiary Institutions (ACTI); most recently as the first Chairman of the Barbados Accreditation Council. A holder of post-graduate degrees of the University of Durham (in Theology), England, and of the University of the West Indies (in History), he is also a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society. He has a number of publications in journals, and is author of two books. He was privileged to deliver the first Thomas Bray Lecture of the U.S.P.G., and the S.P.C.K.

I just started reading this book and have not finished it as yet, but so far it has been very interesting reading. I will post again when I have completed reading the book.
