Grade 5-7-Each text provides background on the history, geography, rulers, people, life, arts, culture, and eventual fate of each civilization. However, the chapter titles do not always provide enough clues as to the complete scope of the section. The subheadings that divide the material into short, manageable segments are more helpful. Readers may need to skim each chapter spread, noting the subheading, to locate needed information. The pages are full of colorful photographs, illustrations, time lines, artwork, and diagrams complete with well-written captions. The texts offer more information than textbooks, but still do not delve deeply enough into each civilization to provide information for more than a simple report. However, the visual artifacts from each civilization are sure to interest students. None of the books includes a bibliography. The same information can be found in Ancient Egypt, Ancient China, and Aztec, Inca, and Maya (all DK, 2000) in the "Eyewitness" series.-Anne L. I used this as a spine book for our homeschool's study of ancient China. We read a little of this book then stopped to read another book specific to a certain aspect of China (Great Wall, Clay Soldiers, Silk Road, etc) I used it as a read-along for my 7-year-old, 5-year-old, and the 3-year-old listened as she played nearby. We loved the pictures and the writing style was easy to follow along with. I really recommend this book to anyone wanting to learn an elementary understanding of Ancient China.

I ordered this book to preview for my 6th grade classroom. I love this series. In fact, we have ordered enough for each student in class to have a copy. It is a great choice. It breaks up the content into sections kids can relate to such as daily life, technology, and much more. It also has lots of graphics to get kids' interest. I highly recommend this series. We ordered several sets from the different titles. Great choice!!

This book is full of great pictures and wonderful information. It made reading a joy! I would definitely recommend using this book.

Delightful
