Becoming Me (Diary Of A Teenage Girl: Caitlin, Book 1)

Synopsis

In the fictional Diary of a Teenage Girl, sixteen-year-old Caitlin O'Conner reveals the inner workings of a girl caught between childhood and womanhood ... an empty life without Christ and a meaningful one with Him. Through Caitlin's candid journal entries we see her grapple with such universal teen issues as peer pressure, loyalty, conflict with parents, the longing for a boyfriend, and her own spirituality. Follow Caitlin O'Conner, a girl much like yourself, as she makes her way from New Year's to the first day of summer -- surviving a challenging home life, changing friends, school pressures, an identity crisis, and the uncertainties of "true love." You'll cry with Caitlin as she experiences heartache, and cheer for her as she encounters a new reality in her life: God. See how rejection by one group can -- incredibly -- sometimes lead you to discover who you really are...

Chapter One Â Monday, January 1 (a rather uneventful new year, so far anyway)Â I heard somewhere that when you write in a diary you should pretend that you're writing a letter to a really good friend, someone you trust completely, and you know will never laugh at you. So that's what I'm telling myself, because to tell the truth I feel kind of silly writing about my life in this dorky little book. And it's funny because I've actually had this diary for several years now, and suddenly it hits me "like hey, I'm sixteen! According to some people this should be one of the most memorable eras of my whole life. Well, I'm not too sure I even want to remember everything about being sixteen, but on the other hand, things seem to be looking up lately, and it might actually be fun to track how the rest of my junior year goes. Especially considering the first few months have been pretty dull so far. But first of all, let me say this: Being sixteen is not really that sweet. And furthermore, it's not terribly exciting either "at least not for me (although I'm certain that some kids my age are having a really great time). Take last night, for instance, I wanted to go to a New Year's Eve party with my friend, Beanie Jacobs. But do you think I got to go? Yeah, right! To protest, I stayed up in my room most of the night, until my mom literally begged me (using her famous it's-a-holiday guilt trip combined with the promise of double-dutch brownies) to "come join the family. And then we watched this really lame video about a bunch of stupid kids who got lost in the woods. And then we stayed up until midnight and watched our neighbors shooting off (what are supposed to be illegal) fireworks. Well, big whoop-dee-doo! But back to being sixteen and how it's not so sweet. What some people don't realize is that sixteen comes with its own set of problems. Like, take driving for instance. I was all excited when I got my license the end of last summer (on my birthday, no less!), and I thought for sure my parents would want to get me a car now. Naturally, I didn't expect a new car (although I wouldn't mind having one of those cool VW Bugs with the little flower vases on the dashboard "maybe in yellow or blue), but I would have settled for almost any old thing with four wheels, as long as it ran decently. But do you think I could get them to spring for a car (even though I patiently explained how they'd never have to haul me around everywhere, and how I would even give my little brother rides to his stupid ball games not to mention run an endless amount of errands for them)? Well, think again! "You don't want to deal with that kind of responsibility yet, Caitlin Renee," Mommy says ever so sweetly. (I'm pretty sure she even patted me on the head!) Honestly, sometimes my parents treat me like I'm still ten years old! And, of course, they say it's because they love me, but I think the truth is they don't really trust me. They probably think if they give me just the tiniest taste of freedom that I'll run hog-wild, get a tattoo, and start smoking dope or something equally disgusting! Why can't they believe in me "just a little? I mean, I've never given them a single reason not to trust me (at least nothing of any real significance). Itâ€™s just not fair. About the only thing they willingly let me do is to go to our churchâ€™s high school youth group functionsâ”and, man, let me tell you, there are some kids in there who are pretty badnews. Not exactly a great âœinfluenceâ• as my dad likes to call any teenage kid he doesnâ€™t quite get (take my best friend, Beanie, for instance, but Iâ€™ll get to her later). Anyway, the thing is, I donâ€™t even tell my parents about the kids in youth group who smoke and drink and God only knows what elseâ”or Iâ€™d never get to go anywhere until I turned twenty-one!â” Now Iâ€™ll try to say something nice about my parents (just in case theyâ€™re reading this). And if they areâ”I will take back every single word of it, and never, ever speak to the old snoops again! Okay, for the most part, my parents are pretty cool (and not the kind of people to read other peopleâ€™s diaries!). For one thing, theyâ€™ve managed to stay married to each other for almost twenty years (a pretty big deal when everyone elseâ€™s parents seem to be splitting up); and my dad has a pretty interesting job at an advertising firm downtown, while my mom teaches first grade. I guess I couldâ€™ve done worse as far as parents go. Like my best friend, Beanie Jacobs, her dad was a cocaine addict who left her mom with nothing but overdue bills when Beanie was still in diapers. On top of that, her momâ€™s kind of freaky and irresponsible, plus she drinks too much and forgets to pay her bills. I know she got married really young, but itâ€™s kind of like she never grew up. But she actually makes Beanie act like the parent most of the time, which is pretty weird, if you ask me.â” Of course, the one good thing about that whole Beanie situation is that she gets to do whatever she wants whenever she wants. And I kind of envy that. Oh, sure, I know it has its down side too. Let me tell you, Lynn Jacobs (Beanieâ€™s mom) can be pretty scary sometimes, and Iâ€™ve seen her tear into Beanie like sheâ€™s a dog or something less than human. As a consequence I try to never get on that womanâ€™s bad side (which lately seems to be every side). Anyway, Beanieâ€™s been my best friend since sixth grade (when we both discovered we were totally hopeless on the violin). I could tell right off she was really smart, and she had this really dry sense of humor. Plus, I liked that she wasnâ€™t afraid to speak up and say how she felt (at least around anyone but her mom).â” Now, Iâ€™ll be the first to admit that Beanie Baby (she goes absolutely nuts when I call her that, which I rarely do, except if Iâ€™m ticked at her about something) tends to dress, well, shall I say, outlandishly (Iâ€™ve been reading Jane Austen books lately and sometimes I wish we still talked like that)? But back to Beanie and how she has this rather interesting sense of style (you see, her mom never gives her any money for clothes, so she has to come up with all these creative ways of dressingâ”and she actually shops at Goodwill, and then she even sews some of her weird stuff together). And sometimes she even dyes her hair some pretty wild colors like magenta or midnight blue. Normally itâ€™s almost black and very curly which she says is because her dad was Jewish, although she doesn't practice his religion. But Beanie's pretty fun to hang with, and I'm glad she's my friend. My parents didn't like her at all at first. But then I got her going to youth group with me. And now they think she's okay but strange, and I don't think they quite trust her. Beanie's actually very pretty (in a sultry kind of way) and one time my mom (trying to be helpful) wanted to give her a complete makeover—but that's another story. Let's just suffice it to say that when Mom was done, Beanie looked like a Mary Kay poster child. Poor Beanie. Well, I guess that's enough for one night. So, now, you can see how my life is just so terribly exciting. Like, wow, maybe they'll make this book into a movie some day! Not!

Wednesday, January 3 (back to school) I need to say that I read back over my first entry in this diary and had to laugh. I mean, I sound like such a blabbermouth. And in real life I'm not even like that. In fact, some people think I'm rather quiet and reserved. My grandma says that's a good thing because there's a Proverb that says something like "even a total fool can appear wise if she keeps her mouth shut." Anyway, I guess the way we express ourselves in writing isn't always the way we express ourselves in real life (and I notice I use a lot of parentheses too). But that's okay—I think writing is fun. Now back to my life!

Okay, today I'm thinking about the pros and cons of popularity (well, mostly the pros). And believe me, I realize (as much as any sixteen-year-old possibly can) that popularity is highly overrated and it's not like it's ever been my primary goal in life. But I guess I never wanted to be a total geek either! And it's not like I am. Not really anyway. Okay, I'm not popular, but I'm not such a loser. I guess I'm just not much of anything. I mean I'm not in any particular group in school—not a geek or a freak, not exactly an academic, and certainly not a jock! Mostly I just hang with Beanie, and sometimes with some of the kids from youth group (but then they can act pretty geeky—sometimes, and we don't always like being connected with them, not that anyone would really care since we are basically nobodies anyway). But just because we're nobodies doesn't mean that kids who think they are somebody should put us down. Does it? I mean, I don't think I put other kids down (even if I think they're total geeks), but I suppose if I was being really honest (which was my original goal in this diary, so I better stick to it)—well, I suppose I might act just a little superior sometimes. I mean, it's not like I really think I'm better than anyone else or anything—but I suppose I might act a little bit snooty, especially when I'm afraid that someone else is going to put me down anyway. I know that's not very nice, but it's the truth.

So, back to the question of popularity. I have to admit that when I was a little kid I used to think it'd be so cool to be the most popular girl in the whole school. Like my Aunt Stephanie—she's my mom's baby sister, but so much younger she could almost be my big sister. Anyway, I remember how Grandma used to complain that the phoneâ€œrang night and dayâ€• for Aunt Stephie. She was a cheerleader and had this really cool boyfriend who looked just like Tom Cruise (Tom was more popular back then, although I still think heâ€™s pretty cool).Â€ Anyway, all that popularity stuff seemed pretty great to an eight-year-old kid, and I remember thinking that when I was in high school, I wanted to be exactly like Aunt Stephie. Not that her life has turned out all that great as a grownup, at least not according to my grandma (sheâ€™s always on poor Stephieâ€™s case) and Iâ€™d have to admit Stephie does have some fairly serious problems (like a baby and no husband plus she freeloads baby-sitting from Grandma). So I guess, in some ways, all that popularity didnâ€™t do her a whole lot of good in the long run. But just the same, I still sometimes wish that I was one the coolest girls in high school. Now, howâ€™s that for honest?Â€ At the same time, Iâ€™d like to think that Iâ€™m more mature than that, and Iâ€™ll admit that Beanie and I sometimes make fun of the â€œpopularâ€• kids (behind their backs, of course!). And like I said, itâ€™s not like Iâ€™m a complete loser eitherâ€”in fact, I got my braces off last fall and my skin is almost completely clear now. I got my hair cut in this really cool style during Christmas break, so that it kind of swings back and forth when I walk. And Aunt Stephie said I look just like Gwyneth Paltrow (of course, she wanted me to baby-sit Oliver at the time, and she mightâ€™ve said anything to seal the deal). Iâ€™ve got a magazine with Gwynethâ€™s photo on it, and I studied my face in the mirror, and I do think there is a slight resemblance. And since I got my haircut, it suddenly seems like other people are looking at me differently. Perhaps even some pretty cool people are actually looking my way (unless itâ€™s my imagination). But even so, it feels kind of good. I mean all these years before I just felt kind of invisible (which wasnâ€™t so bad; I mean, it was better than sticking out in a crowd).Â€ Now I know I must be sounding all lame and desperate to go on like this (not to mention totally shallow); like all I care about is getting some airhead approval from a bunch of kids who arenâ€™t all that nice in the first place. And, like I said, itâ€™s not like I donâ€™t already have any friends. I mean thereâ€™s always Beanie. Thereâ€™s a few others too. Okay, I admit it, theyâ€™re mostly from the youth group! But at least I know theyâ€™d stick by me through the very worst. I think some of the nicer ones would. I seriously doubt if those popular kids would be like that. Not that Iâ€™ll ever have a chance to find out. But on the other hand, I guess Iâ€™d be willing to find out, if I had the chance.Â€ Okay, is that so terribly wrong? Is it so wrong to want some different friends for a change? To want life to change and become more exciting? Last week our youth group leader said that if we donâ€™t have something that we really think we need, we should pray for it. I wonder if it would be wrong to pray to become popular. I guess the worst that could happen is that God could say no. It might be worth a try. I donâ€™t know why God wouldn't want me to have more friends; we're always being told to "reach out" to those around us. Hey, I'm willing to do some reaching here. Well, all this wondering is probably just a big, stupid waste of time, because I'm sure the popular kids don't want to hang with me anyway. I've heard them make fun of the geeks and nerds and freaks before "as if we're all deaf and can't even hear them. Or maybe they think we have absolutely no feelings at all. In fact, now that I think about it, I can't even believe that I've sat here and actually considered hanging with kids like that in the first place. But I'm supposed to be honest here. And the truth is, I would hang with them if only they would let me. But, I ask you, is that so terribly wrong?

Christian teen books that are just plain stories are really hard to find. So, I ordered as many different authors as I could find. Well, this book is WINNING!! My 13 year old loves it. She says its "real" sounding. As if a teen wrote it. I am all for stuff that keeps my kids interested. Thank you Melody for this book! As an adult, I see it deals with real issues, such as self image and comprehending tragedy. Just an all around good purchase.

I purchased this book for my 14 old daughter for which it did not entirely grab and keep her attention. I did read the book and thought it was O.K.. It gives insight into a teenage christian girls' thoughts on the importance, or so she thinks, of being popular, dating for the first time, deciding not to date because it threatens her ability to remain true to her strong beliefs, teen pregnancy via Caitlin's BFF, and insight into her thoughts on why not to abort a baby, teenage girls relationships with parents, the vulnerability of parents in the world, parents who make the wrong choices, and about forgiving others. Although Caitlin is about 3 years older than my daughter I felt a lot of the topics may very well be relative to her high school world. I have been very open and honest with my daughter regarding these issues therefore felt comfortable giving the book to her. In giving her the book I also had hopes that it may give her early insight into these matters from the perspective of another (fictional) teenage girl.

This book, "becoming me", has helped me realize that faith is more than a feeling and that we should always put God first. This book of the first series is very powerful and gripping in every way imaginable. I am now strengthened and believe that I can accomplish more with God's help. I hate this a five star!

daughter LOVES the series. she can really relate and wants more books.

Gave this to my tween daughter who just started junior high this year and has been dealing with all new body changes, hormones, feelings, social circuits, as well as a huge amount of responsibility in school. I plan to read it with her.

Every teenage girl should read this book. Read this book when I was a teen and now bought it to pass down to my sister who is 15. Melody Carlson definitely has a way to reach teens in a unique manner

This was a gift for my 13-year-old daughter....she couldn't put it down. Now we need to order the next book in the series!

Chose this book for my daughter because I was looking for a contemporary teen fiction book that upheld Christian values. At the same time looking for something real, not saccharine-y and pat, something about real issues young people face. I have not read the book myself, but read the recommendations. My daughter read it and loved and said she wants the next one in the series.
